WOODWORM IDENTIFICATION: 11 TYPES OF WOOD BORING INSECT THAT COULD BE EATING YOU OUT OF HOUSE & HOME – PART 3 OF 12

#3. Death Watch Beetle

Latin name: Xestobium Rufovillosum

Appearance: A slightly furry, bee-like beetle, with both dark and light brown coloring, this small insect is capable of inflicting severe timber damage.

Preferred timber: The Death Watch Beetle loves rotting hardwoods such as Elm and Oak.

Type of damage: Often associated with white rot, this beetle is a committed and extensive tunnel builder, and will take flight to find other rotting wood if needed.

Telltale signs: Creates rounded tunnels with boreholes of around 2 mm in width. Its tunnels are filled extensively with frass, which is clearly visible upon inspection. Creates a distinctive tapping sound to attract mates – often on quiet summer nights. This clock-like ticking has been associated in literature with death keeping a vigil over the dying, counting down to their demise – thus the name.

Next Month - Ambrosia Beetle
